Our engineering team comprises of seasoned and experienced engineers in various disciplines of engineering such as process instrumentation, piping, pipeline construction, structural, mechanical, and electrical. Some of our Engineers also specialise in subsea engineering.

Dredging Services

Our dredging services cut across

- Grab dredging
- Backhoe dredging
- Trailing suction hopper dredging 'trailer'
- Water injection dredging

Grab dredgers are mechanisms for a relatively simple method of dredging which involves the collection of sediments in a crane mounted bucket, the jaws of which are opened and closed (rope operated or hydraulically) like a clamshell trapping sediments.

Backhoes are shore-based or pontoon mounted 'diggers' which can be used in marine environments, especially where ground conditions are difficult, such as shallow waters and confined spaces.

The trailing suction hopper dredger or 'trailer' is commonly used for maintenance dredging in coastal areas. As the ship moves slowly ahead, sediments from the seabed are pumped through trailing dragheads into a hopper (reception tank). Suspended sediments can be generated as the draghead moves over the seabed, and from various other operating activities. However, the largest contribution to increased concentration arises from overflow during loading. Trailer dredgers can be used for maintenance dredging in environmentally sensitive area if special care is taken.

Water injection 'jetsed' is a relatively new method of dredging which operates by injecting water into certain fine-grained sea bed materials, reducing their density to the point where they act as a fluid and flow over the bed through the action of gravity to lower levels. The aim of this type of dredging is not to raise sediments into the water column, and where properly applied, environmental effects due to suspended solids are restricted to the vicinity of the seabed and are minimised greatly.
